Call for Participants: Narrative Interviews Emotional Dimension of Palliative Care

Are you a palliative carer or palliative educator interested in sharing your experience with the emotional dimension of your work? If so I would like to invite you to participate in a qualitative study exploring the ways in which professionals from different fields experience and navigate emotion.

Project Overview:

This research seeks to understand the role and significance of emotion in the context of professional practice. It investigates potential parallels between the experiences of palliative carers and those in other caring professions such as education, particularly climate education. It is hoped that the research will generating insights and developing practices to better support professionals working with children and young people.

More about the researcher:

My name is Tim Coxon and I am a PhD student at the University of Sussex, a teacher educator with lived experience of end of life care and bereavement. The focus of my work has been on reflective practice, supporting climate and ecological education initiatives, and promoting the wellbeing of teachers, children and young people.

Participation Details:

I am seeking participants from palliative care sector to engage in two interviews lasting up to 1 hour each. The interviews offer the opportunity for you to share and explore your experience in a safe, reflective and supportive space.

Participants will receive an honorarium to thank them for their time, along with reimbursement for any reasonable travel expenses incurred.

Benefits of Participation:

- Engage in supportive reflective dialogue about professional challenges
- Share expertise on the emotional demands of your work and professional support structures that may support the development of practice in other professional fields
